literature on the use of checklists in auditing and other fields we offer a framework for effective use of checklists that incorporates the nature of the audit task checklist design checklist application and contextual factors our analysis of checklist research in auditing suggests that improvements to checklist design and to checklist application methods can make checklists more effective in particular with regard to fraud risk assessments customizing checklists to fit both client circumstances and the characteristics of the fraud risk assessment task along with auditor reliance on formal cue combination models rather than on judgmental cue combination could make fraud checklists more effective than extant research implies
